IN MEMORIAM

On the Death of Mrs. Julius McGeehee.

The following touching tribute to the memory of the late Mrs. Julius McGeehee is taken from the Catholic Mirror of Saturday.

ROANOKE, Aug. 25, 1890.

Seldom has our community been visited by a greater sorrow than in the death of Hester White McGeehee, which occurred yesterday at 8 a. m., amid the consolation of her holy religion, and the untiring devotion of sorrowing family and friends. She had been ill for two months and was thought very much better, when she was afflicted with paralysis, which went gradually to the brain, and she lingered as if loth to leave a heart-broken mother, a most devoted husband, two loving sisters and brothers, and six charming children. And, as if mindful of her great love for all, her heavenly Father left that bright mind unclouded so she could take a last loving look at the treasures of that maternal love before giving them back to Him who rewarded her labors by taking her to Himself.

Her funeral took place this afternoon from St. Andrew's church, conducted by Rev. J. W. Lynch, who paid an excellent tribute to the many virtues of the deceased. The honorary pall-bearers were: C. O'Leary, J. A. McDonald, M. J. McNamara, M. J. Rogers, John McCarthy, M. P. Vaughan, M. B. Forbes and William Noble. Mrs. McGeehee was born at Sweet Springs, W. Va., August 4th, 1849, of Edward and Catherine White, earliest Irish Catholic settlers, educated at home in the country, thoroughly grounded in Catholic doctrine, married about sixteen years ago to Julius McGeehee, who was at that time a non-Catholic, but was afterwards received into the church by Rev. J. W. Lynch. Amid her many household duties she still found time for literary pursuits. "Buried Alive," "Clouds and Pearls," and her last book, "Glen Mary," have all been highly commended. Possessed of a lively, intelligent faith, far above the average in brilliant attainments, full of charity toward those in distress, a woman of so much character that it can better describe her in the lines of Tennyson:

"Howe'er it be, it seems to me
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith more than Norman blood."

She taught a select school for a number of years at Trevilians, Va., and many of the young ladies of the neighborhood owe their high culture to the deceased. And when her lot was cast in Roanoke she was the first to organize the noble trials of church school, and all who know anything of such work can fully appreciate her labors. Herself and her sister, Miss White, spared no pains and in a few months had a parish school that would have done credit to any church. Her organization of the school inspired a new era of faith in the young, and for the short time she had been in Roanoke few were so well or so favorably known; but I could write volumes of the noble trials of church school, and all who know anything of such work can fully appreciate her labors.
